

Living on the Links

Golf course communities offer more than just fun on the fairways

By Jeff Marcus

The Residences at Bulle Rock, the new golf course community in Havre de Grace, Maryland, is fast earning a reputation for its challenging golf course (home to the McDonald's LPGA Championship), great homes and sweeping views of the Chesapeake Bay. The resort-style community recently sold its 500th home, making it the area's number-one selling planned community.

Realtors Chuck and Candy Brennan visited The Residences at Bulle Rock in the fall of 2006, and were impressed by its centralized location within minutes of I-95. One of their sons, an avid golfer, was more impressed by the five-star Bulle Rock Golf Course. Most of all, like many purchasers of homes in golf course communities, the Brennans say they were "drawn to the development's way of life." According to Candy, "the Community Center was very important to us, as we wanted to be able to exercise, swim and play tennis right in our own community. We also embraced the social aspect and the possibility of participating in activities with people having common interests." The Brennans ended up purchasing a home from NVHomes, becoming Bulle Rock's 500th buyers.

The golf course at The Residences at Bulle Rock (above) is home to the McDonald's LPGA Championship. NVHomes is one of five companies building luxury homes (below) in the community, located in Havre de Grace, Maryland.